WRIT OF ELECTION

To the Commissioners of Election in each of the several Counties of the State of West Virginia, Greeting:

I, Ephraim F. Morgan, Governor of the State of West Virginia, by virtue of Section 7, Article VIII of the Constitution, and of Section 4 of Chapter 4 of the Code of West Virginia, relating to vacancies in office, do hereby order that an election be held throughout the state and in each of the several counties thereof, at the next general election to be held therein on the seventh day of November, in the year of our Lord, 1922, to fill the vacancy in the office of Judge of the Supreme Court of Appeals for the unexpired term, caused by the resignation of the Honorable Charles W. Lynch, of Harrison County, occurring December 31, 1921, and to which office, I appointed the Honorable James A. Meredith, of Marion County to fill such vacancy until the successor of said Charles W. Lynch should at said general election be duly elected and qualified as provided by law.

Done at the City of Charleston in the County of Kanawha, State of West Virginia, on this first day of September, 1922 and in the sixtieth year of the State.

E. F. Morgan, Governor.

By the Governor, Attest: Houston G. Young, Secretary of State.

RAMASWAMI'S PILLAR

By MARY R. FLEMING

Well, we had a great time yesterday. We went to see Ramaswami's Pillar.

Ramaswami is a mythological hero who is represented in the earlier stories as a man, but in the later ones as a god. There is a poem that tells us how this Rama, the eldest son of the king of Ajahliya, came to be banished to the forest by his father, how his young wife, Sita, voluntarily went with him, how she was carried away by the giant Ravana, and finally recovered by Rama, the monkeys helping him. This particular pillar is not a man built shrine or memorial of any kind, but a great mass of rock standing alone in an unexpected place and ascribed to the national hero because he only was thought worthy of such a pillar. At least that is my supposition. I could not hear of any particular local legend connected with it.

The six women of the party were to leave at seven in the morning in rickshaws, the two men going on bicycles. But Indian promises for a particular time are apt to be poor things upon which to depend, especially when the particular time is early in the morning. So we were not surprised when the rickshaws did not appear. The two men who were going from our house set out on foot, with a servant to carry the wraps and lunch basket, and then I waited a weary time by the side of the road while the other one went to the rickshaw place and got the vehicles started. Perhaps you do not all know what a rickshaw is like. It is a sort of grown up baby carriage on two wheels and with a top that can be put up or down. Some are large enough for two people and some for only one. The motor power is furnished by two men in front who pull and one or two behind who push. It is a comfortable enough way to ride if the men are skillful about taking the rough places in the road. The principal trouble is that the men always try to make one get out and walk up all the hill, just the places where one does not wish to walk. I suppose those who have been here long enough can withstand their plea and not feel badly, but I have not yet gotten used to being pulled by human beings as though they were animals, and when I stay in I feel like a brute, though certainly I am not so "hefty" but that four men ought to be able to pull me without hurting themselves. However, for those of us who do not happen to possess motor cars this is the only way of getting about here, so one rides in them.

We finally got started, only an hour late, which is not at all bad for India. We rode for about five miles, up hill and down, but mostly ascending, getting wider and wider views of the surrounding mountains. It was very hot in the sun, which may not be a surprising statement for a day in the middle of June. But you must remember that here June is an autumn month, that summer is drawing to a close, and the "cold weather" is approaching. The woods through which we were passing, however, seemed in the full flush of summer still. Sometimes we rode through long vista of the graceful gum trees that give much the same effect that the pines do at home, so tall and straight and far reaching. It is not, however, so exactly perpendicular as a tree as the pine, and each tree appears to be the slightly twisted, so that all the lines of the tree and its bark markings are graceful curves. Then there was the flamboyer tree, or "flame of the forest," which would almost tempt one to exclaim, on coming upon it unexpectedly, "Look! that tree is on fire!" Geraniums grow wild here, becoming great bushes, sometimes large as small trees, but the blossom is apt to be smaller and less abundant than in the cultivated variety. Both white and purple passion flower vines were seen bearing their distinctive flowers high in air. We saw both wild and cultivated tea. The cultivated plants are kept down to comparatively small bushes, but the wild ones grow into sizable shrubs, and bear velvety cream colored blossoms with a faint sweet odor. All along the way we saw the small pink blossoms of the "hill guava," which are in great abundance here, and whenever we stopped every one gathered a handful of the pale yellow fruit, which is about the size of a small cherry, has a rather thick skin, and inside is much like a gooseberry, but sweeter and with a delicate raspberry flavor. There are many other trees and plants that are strange to me, but on the whole these woods do not compare in beauty with those of our Alleghany mountains at almost any season of the year.

After two hours riding, the paths becoming gradually more narrow, and turning into the fastnesses of the mountains, we reached a village where the road for even the narrow rickshaw evidently came to an end, and we dismounted and prepared to walk the rest of the way. With some difficulty we succeeded in getting guides to show us the way, and we turned into the forest where we followed a blazed trail for about three miles. But it was three miles set on end. We climbed and climbed up a great hill where the roots of the trees made steps that were sometimes a help and sometimes a hindrance. We clambered over fallen logs and through piles of fallen leaves. We longed for the descent on the other side, and when we came we were not much better off, for it was full of loose stones and treacherous short turns. As fast as we mounted one hill another valley and another hill lay before us. Our guides did not seem any too certain of their way, and hesitated to take the lead. Sometimes the trail trail was worn deeply into the rock, as though from numberless years of travel, and reminded me of the same sort of trail in Persia. Sometimes it led across great bare stretches of smooth rock and sometimes through grass and bushes that met above our heads, and always we were going deeper and deeper into the mountains and we caught occasional glimpses of an ever widening view out over the peaks beyond. At last we were all beginning to wonder seriously if we were really getting anywhere or just wandering in the forest, we topped a hill and found what we had come to find. From our feet the ground dropped sharply, almost precipitously into a deep valley that rolled away below us for two or three miles, thickly covered with forest growth that looked as if it had never been touched, and certainly had never been disturbed by the hand or foot of man. From the floor of this valley, perhaps an eighth of a mile away from us, apart from all other rocks, standing alone in solitary grandeur, was Ramaswami's pillar. It is a great mass of rock, its flat top about on a level with the tops of the hills, which we ascended, its base lost in the thick and tangled tropical growth of the steep mountain sides. We had been told by Hindus that there was or had been a temple on the top, but its sides though not perpendicular, are so steep as to be unclimbable, and no heathen temple has ever profaned at least that spot of God's earth.

Beyond the valley rose a range of hills, and beyond that another and another, until counting them was like trying to number the stars. They left away and rose again in such a panorama of sunbright peaks and shadowed valleys as has never been my lot to see before, while in the distance lay the great Mysore plateau, shimmering in the afternoon sun, its horizon lost in golden haze and fleecy clouds. It is a most wonderful view, and we all voted it well worth the trouble and the toil necessary in order to see it.

Those of us who had brought kodaks took some pictures, but the sweep and extent of the country was too big for our small machines, and it was not the best time of the day for picture taking so I doubt whether they will amount to much. Then we sought a shady spot and ate our picnic lunch, red eyed and reluctantly began the homeward journey. The way back to the village did not seem quite so long as it had coming but we were more tired than we had been in the morning. We were glad enough to settle into our rickshaws and give the word to go home. Our rickshaw men began clammering at the foot of the first hill for us to walk up, but we heartily informed them that we had been walking, climbing, laboring for hours while they had been resting and we now expected to ride and rest for a while at least. So they grinned at us and went on cheerfully. We rode home through the cool of the afternoon, meeting sometimes the carts of the countryside returning to their villages, but scarcely anyone else. These carts are very picturesque in a somewhat rude way. They are big two wheeled things, with a frame that supports a covering of heavy matting. Each one is drawn by a pair of great white or mouse colored bullocks, that have long curving horns. These are often tipped with brass, and sometimes painted, one horn red and the other blue, or some other combination. On festive occasions a garland of flowers is put around the bullock's neck, or about the base of his horns. The rickshaw men began a sort of chant. The front man giving a few words, or only a single one, and the men behind repeating or answering all in a rhythmic singsong that was not unpleasant on the quiet afternoon air. We reached home very tired and hungry, but well satisfied that we had seen a sight worth seeing and one that will long remain a memory of delight. Guntur, India.
